Not illustrated. 1840 Excerpt: .offered, and erected batteries on the crown of the glacis; several breaches were opened, but as the passage of the ditch had not been effected, owing to the fire of the besieged, they were not deemed very accessible, and Tilly had doubts of the result. Pappenheim s impetuosity overcame his scruples, and a general assault was determined upon; but not before the citizens had been lulled into security by the pretended retreat of the besiegers. On the ninth of May, the fire of the imperial artillery suddenly ceased; the guns were withdrawn from the batteries; an unusual silence prevailed in camp, and every thing indicated that the siege was raised. Count Gualdo, who was present in Tilly s army, informs us, that the imperial adherents in the town helped to render this opinion general; but we should not believe that men, having life and fortune depending...
