Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from Her First Scoop: A Comedy in One Act Ruth King and Madge Marshall, clever young reporters on a daily paper, meet on a rainy afternoon at a tea room. Ruth, who is on the lowest round of the journalistic ladder, confides to her companion that an opportunity for promotion has at last presented itself in the shape of a particular assignment, but adds that she has failed to land the scoop. She relates her fruitless attempt to gain an interview with Stanley Lee, a young millionaire, who is in the city on an interesting mission, namely, the disposal of a large sum bequeathed to the community by his father, and is in despair because she has not succeeded in her quest. Madge assures her that stratagem is a reporter's best asset, and with this advice leaves her. While waiting for her order to be filled, Ruth, wanders to the window, and as she gazes out abstractedly sees the object of her thoughts, the elusive millionaire. For a moment she hesitates, then asks the maid who has brought in her tea to summon the young man to her. He enters, she rushes impulsively to him, greets him as the husband of her best friend and cleverly invents an excuse for their meeting. The man accepts the situation, falls in with the story, parries the questions and apparently enjoys the tete-a-tete. Ruth skilfully introduces the subject of the memorial fund and gleans enough from his conversation to furnish ample material for her article. As they finish their tea, and there is no further excuse for lingering, her duplicity overwhelms her and she confesses the scheme by...
