A FATHERS TALKS WITH HIS CHILDREN; OR THE DANGER OF SETTING ONES OWN JUDGMENT ABOVE THE LAW. My father was a man of great common-sense and judgment, but pious withal, and was much renowned in the district for his strict honesty. More than once he had been chosen to arbitrate between his fellow, citizens, and even strangers who did not know him personally confided in him to carry out their last wishes. When he died the poor wept his loss; and during his last illness both rich and poor showed their sympathy and grieved when he was heard to be dying. I shall always preserve his portrait in my memory; I fancy I see him sitting in his large arm-chair, with his serene countenance and quiet manner, and his voice still lingers in my ears. I will give an account of one of our evenings together; it is a sample of many similar hours spent thus in familiar converse. It was winter and we were sitting round him near the fire, the Abbe, my sister, and myself. After speaking of the inconveniences attending celebrity, he said, My son, you and I have both made a noise in the world, but there was this difference, the noise you made with your tool deprived you of rest, but that which I made with mine deprived others of their rest. When the old cutler had made this little joke he fell into a reverie and gazed at us...
